Dome expands into South Bay

Dome Construction Corp. has opened a San Jose office with veteran Melody Spradlin at its helm. Spradlin, who most recently built labs for Genentech Inc. in South San Francisco, has more than two decades of experience focusing on tech construction. Spradlin, who was a consulting professor at Stanford University until 2003, has also built projects for Sugen Inc., Amgen Inc. and Sequus Pharmaceuticals.

She acknowledged that opening a new office in such an economy is risky, but said the San Francisco-based Dome wants to be closer to the tech companies that will require its services.

“I’ve never seen a market like this,” she said. “But I’m really good at making connections and helping people solve problems. There are still people out there who need someone who can pull together a team who understands their problems.”

Spradlin said that last week she signed a client who she cannot name yet but who will require a data center and office.
